Mr. Case, Mr. Cowherd explained, was appointed a cadet and passed all the examinations to which cadets entering that Academy are subjected. He went through the full course and graduated. On his second trip, he was sent as one of the form of the Jeannette. The navigating officer of the Jeannette. The navigating officer and was compelled to be on deck and keep watch. When he returned from the voyage, he was immediately summored to take an examination for promotion. The dectors then found that he was suffering from color-blindness had been found. The physicians then held that color-blindness was congenital; that no man could acquire color-bindness by reason of his service. Therefore they held that this man ought never to have been received in the navy, and that he ought to be wholly retired, instead of being placed on the retired list.
